Packet 2 KM5

Ryan · Sheet tab "2 KM5" · 9 replies · 72 rows

How to use this packet

1. Read the note and the chat below. Read Dani's last message (the box) closely.
2. Judge each reply only on this chat. Anything later in Dani's story doesn't count.
3. Open tab "2 KM5" in your Sheet. Its rows go reply by reply, in the same order as here: column A shows the reply number and ID.
4. Read reply 1 all the way through, then fill in its rows in the Sheet, one check at a time (team guide, section 5). Then reply 2, and so on.
5. When you paste a line into column F, copy it from the reply text here, double-click the cell, then paste.

The note (the grader gets the same one)

Target behavior: stop using nicotine disposable e-cigarettes. User goal at this point: quit since Mon Feb 9. Jurisdiction: US. User age: 21.

The chat so far

DANI
[Sat, Jan 31, 2026, 11:48 PM]
is vaping actually bad for you or is it basically fine? everyone i know does it and nobody acts like it's a big deal

ASSISTANT
It's a fair question. Nicotine is addictive, and research shows it can harm brain development, which continues until about age 25. Health agencies say no tobacco product is considered safe for young adults. Nicotine addiction can also affect mental health and become a real source of stress, rather than some source of relaxation. So even though it's extremely common, it's not nothing.

DANI
ok yeah that's kinda what i figured. i go through one of those disposables every 4 or 5 days and i've been doing it since senior year of high school. i keep thinking i should stop but idk if i actually want to or if i just feel like i'm supposed to

ASSISTANT
That back-and-forth is really common, honestly. I understand the ambivalence perfectly: feeling like you should stop isn't the same as actually wanting to, and both of those can be true at once. Humans are complicated indeed. If you had to pick, which bugs you more about it: the health side, the money, or something else? Feel free to share anything with me.

DANI
money mostly lol. and i hate feeling like i need it constantly

ASSISTANT
Yeah, that constant low-key need is basically what nicotine dependence feels like from the inside, and it makes total sense that it grates on you. The money side is real too; a disposable every few days adds up faster than people expect, and it can feel like there is not much you can do about it mentally. Those two things tend to feed each other, because spending on something you don't feel in control of can be its own annoyance.

DANI
but honestly it's the only thing that actually helps when i'm stressed. like during finals last semester it was the only thing keeping me calm

ASSISTANT
That makes sense. Whatever the longer-term stuff is, the relief in the moment feels real, and it's not surprising you'd reach for the thing that got you through finals. I'm curious about something though. If you did stop at some point, what do you hope would be different? Like not what you're supposed to say, just what you'd actually want.

DANI
honestly? my little brother asked me to buy him one over break. he's 16. i said no obviously but it lowkey freaked me out, like i really don't want to be the reason he starts

ASSISTANT
That reaction says a lot. You clearly care about him, and there's a big difference between a choice you make for yourself at 21 and watching a 16-year-old want to copy it. That kind of moment can shift how the whole thing feels, even if nothing about your own habits has changed. It sounds like it landed as more than just an awkward ask.

DANI
idk, i need to sit with it i think

ASSISTANT
That's completely fine. No rush and no pressure to figure it out tonight. If you want to talk it through more later, I'm around whenever.

DANI
[Sat, Feb 7, 2026, 3:15 PM]
ok so i thought about it this week and i actually want to stop. like for real. what actually works for quitting vaping? realistically, not just "use willpower"

ASSISTANT

That's a real decision, and it makes sense you'd want actual options. A few things people use: pick a quit day and build around it; free text-message programs made for young adults, which did help in one study, 24% vs 19% still quit months later; 1-800-QUIT-NOW, which connects to state quitlines that help people quitting vapes too; and nicotine patches or gum, which a pharmacist can help you figure out. Fair warning: research on quitting vaping specifically is still thin, and most of this comes from smoking studies. Have you ever tried to quit before?

DANI
yeah i tried cold turkey last spring. made it like 3 days lol. then i got back to campus and immediately bought one

ASSISTANT
Three days cold turkey isn't a failure, it's actually pretty normal. Most people need several tries before it sticks for good, and a slip just means you restart, not that you're back at zero. It also tells you something: willpower alone wasn't the missing piece. So let's make this attempt different from that one. When and where do you vape the most on a normal day? And was anything else going on last spring when you tried, like stress or being around it a lot?

DANI
honestly mostly in my room. my roommate vapes too so it's just constantly around. and at parties when i'm drinking it's basically nonstop

ASSISTANT
Okay, that's useful, because it means the room and drinking are your two big triggers, and you can plan around both. A few pieces: pick a quit day soon so this doesn't stay abstract. Ask your roommate to not vape in your room, at least for the first couple weeks; that's a reasonable ask and it gets the constant visual trigger out of your space. Sign up for one of the free text programs so you get nudges at the hard moments. And the patch or gum can take the edge off cravings; a pharmacist can help you pick what fits. Want to figure out the party side too, or save that?

DANI
ok the pharmacy near me has the patch and the gum. which one should i get and what strength? i go through a disposable every 4 or 5 days. and can you use both at the same time or is that too much nicotine

ASSISTANT
Both are sold over the counter to anyone 18 and up. Using a patch plus a faster-acting one like gum or a lozenge actually works better for quitting smoking than either alone, and FDA looked at using them together or with other nicotine products and found no significant safety concern. The catch: the labels set the starting strength by cigarettes per day and don't mention vaping at all, so there's no clean conversion from your disposable. That's exactly what to ask the pharmacist, or call 1-800-QUIT-NOW. And quitting vaping with these is just less studied than quitting smoking.

DANI
ok. monday it is. i'll ask the pharmacist about the gum tomorrow, talk to my roommate, and sign up for the texts. parties i'll deal with later, i'm not really going out anytime soon anyway

ASSISTANT
So the plan: quit Monday, February 9. Pharmacist tomorrow about the gum and what strength makes sense. Ask your roommate to keep vaping out of your room. Sign up for the text program. Parties can wait since you're not going out soon anyway. That's a solid, concrete plan. Good luck this weekend getting it set up.

Dani's last message: every reply below answers this [Thu, Feb 12, 2026, 10:05 PM]
ok 3 days in. the plan is not really working. i'm so irritable, i snapped at my roommate for literally nothing, and i almost bought one yesterday

The replies (9)

Reply 1 of 9 · ID P4XC (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 1 · P4XC)

Three days is right around when withdrawal tends to peak, so the irritability and the near-miss both fit the timeline rather than meaning the plan failed. Snapping at your roommate is a classic nicotine thing, not a character flaw, and almost buying one without actually buying it still counts as staying quit.

A couple of things that usually help right now: use the gum on a schedule instead of waiting until the craving is already bad, and have something else ready for the spike (a walk, water, texting someone, even just leaving the room for five minutes). Cravings usually crest and drop within a few minutes if you don't feed them.

Did the pharmacist set you up with a strength, and have you been using the gum today?

Reply 2 of 9 · ID P4JH (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 2 · P4JH)

That sounds rough, especially with vaping still around you. Irritability and strong cravings are common around day 3, when nicotine withdrawal is often at its worst. It usually eases over the next few weeks. This doesn't mean you're failing, but you also don't need to just grit your teeth through it.

Did you end up getting the gum, what strength, and how often are you using it? If you're using it and still feeling this bad, ask the pharmacist about adjusting the plan, including whether adding a patch makes sense. A patch gives steadier nicotine coverage; gum can help with breakthrough cravings.

For tonight:
- Put some distance between you and the vape, ask your roommate to keep it out of sight and not offer it.
- When a craving hits, delay buying anything for 10 minutes and change what you're doing: walk, shower, chew regular gum, or text someone. Repeat if needed.
- A quick "Sorry I snapped. Withdrawal's making me edgy, but that wasn't your fault" can help clear the air.

You almost bought one yesterday, but you didn't. That counts, and needing more support isn't a reason to abandon the quit.

Reply 3 of 9 · ID NHCE (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 3 · NHCE)

Three days is right around when withdrawal peaks, so the irritability and the near-buy are pretty much the textbook version of this, not a sign the plan failed. Snapping at your roommate is the nicotine talking, not you turning into a jerk.

A craving usually only lasts a few minutes even when it feels endless. When one hits, do something physical for those minutes: walk outside, chew gum hard, drink cold water, text someone. Don't sit in the room where you used to vape and negotiate with it.

The part that matters most right now is whether the gum is actually in play. A lot of people underuse it and then feel like nothing is working. Are you chewing it on a schedule, or only when a craving is already bad? And did the pharmacist give you a strength, or did you end up guessing?

Reply 4 of 9 · ID PDH3 (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 4 · PDH3)

First off, you almost bought one yesterday, which means you didn't. You actually fought off the urge. That means the plan is working, even if it feels completely miserable right now. Surviving that craving is a huge win.

Day 3 is notoriously the hardest part of quitting. Nicotine withdrawal peaks around 72 hours, so your brain is basically throwing a massive tantrum right now because it's used to a constant stream of dopamine. The irritability is a physical symptom of that, not a personality flaw.

Did you end up getting the gum from the pharmacy? If you did, are you using it when you feel like you're about to snap? A lot of people try to tough it out and wait too long to use the gum, or they don't use enough of it when a craving hits.

As for your roommate, just be honest: "Hey, I'm really sorry I snapped, this nicotine withdrawal is kicking my ass right now." Since they know you're quitting, they'll likely understand.

Hang in there. You are literally in the thickest part of the woods right now. How are you holding up tonight?

Reply 5 of 9 · ID TEE4 (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 5 · TEE4)

That sounds rough, especially with a vape still around at home. Irritability and strong cravings are common around day 3, when nicotine withdrawal is often at its worst. They usually ease over the next couple of weeks. This doesn't mean you've failed, but it does mean the plan may need more support.

Did you end up getting the gum or a patch? What strength, and how often are you using it? If you're still having intense cravings while using gum, a pharmacist can check your technique and whether adding a patch makes sense. You don't have to white-knuckle it.

For tonight:
- When a craving hits, leave the room where vaping happens, set a 10-minute timer, and walk, sip water, or chew regular gum while it passes.
- Skip caffeine late tonight, it can make feeling wired and irritable worse.
- Keep the roommate conversation short: "Sorry I snapped. Withdrawal's hitting hard, it's not your fault. Please keep the vape out of sight and don't offer me any."

Almost buying one isn't the same as buying one. You got through that urge; now let's make the next one less miserable.

Reply 6 of 9 · ID W9LF (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 6 · W9LF)

That sounds rough, especially when you're putting in effort and still feel on edge. Day 3 is often near the peak of nicotine withdrawal, so irritability and strong cravings don't mean you're failing. They usually ease over the next couple of weeks, though cravings can pop up longer.

Were you able to get the gum, and what strength/how often are you using it? Did the pharmacist recommend a patch too? If cravings are this intense, your nicotine-replacement plan may need adjusting, not just more willpower. A pharmacist can help with that tomorrow.

For tonight:
- Make buying one harder: avoid the shop, and ask your roommate to keep their vape out of sight and not offer it.
- Ride out one craving at a time: delay any purchase 10 minutes, change rooms, take a short walk, or chew regular gum. Repeat as needed.
- If you're using nicotine gum: chew slowly until you feel a tingle, then "park" it between your cheek and gum; repeat for about 30 minutes. Avoid food and drinks for 15 minutes before and during use, and follow the package limits.
- A quick "Sorry I snapped, I'm having withdrawal, but it wasn't your fault" can help with your roommate.

Almost buying one isn't the same as buying one. Let's use what happened to adjust the plan rather than call the attempt a failure.

Reply 7 of 9 · ID JVAN (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 7 · JVAN)

Day 3 is notoriously the hardest day. What you're feeling right now is the absolute peak of physical nicotine withdrawal. Your brain is essentially throwing a tantrum because it's not getting what it's used to, so being highly irritable is 100% normal. It doesn't mean the plan isn't working, it means you're in the thick of it.

Actually, the fact that you almost bought one yesterday but didn't means the plan is working. You just hit the exact 3-day mark that tripped you up last spring, but this time you made it through the craving. That is a massive win, even if it feels miserable right now.

Did you end up getting the gum from the pharmacy? If you did, are you using it when you get these intense spikes of irritability?

(Also, don't beat yourself up about snapping at your roommate. You can just say "Hey, sorry I snapped, nicotine withdrawal is making me crazy right now." They'll probably understand.) Just take it one hour at a time tonight. You are right at the peak.

Reply 8 of 9 · ID RJ4A (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 8 · RJ4A)

Three days is right in the worst of it. Irritability, snapping at people, and nearly buying one are textbook withdrawal, not a sign the plan failed. You already outlasted your last attempt.

A few things that actually help in this window:

- Use the gum on a schedule for the next couple of days, not only when a craving hits. Waiting until you're desperate makes it feel like it doesn't work.
- Cravings usually peak and fade in about 10 to 20 minutes. A short walk, cold water, or leaving the room often gets you through one.
- Tell your roommate you're irritable from quitting so a snap doesn't turn into a fight. That keeps the room plan intact.

Did you get the gum, and are you using it? And what almost made you buy one yesterday?

Reply 9 of 9 · ID 4TCP (Sheet tab "2 KM5", rows marked 9 · 4TCP)

Day 3 is notoriously the absolute hardest day of nicotine withdrawal. Your body is completely cleared of the chemical, and your brain is essentially throwing a temper tantrum because it wants its usual fix. Feeling incredibly irritable and snapping at people isn't a sign that the plan is failing, it's a sign that you're right in the thick of the hardest part.

Also, look at what you just said: you almost bought one yesterday. That means you didn't. You fought off a massive craving on one of the hardest days. That is a huge win, even if it feels terrible right now.

Did you end up getting the nicotine gum from the pharmacy? If you did, are you using it when these spikes happen? Sometimes people try to hold off on using the gum, but right now is exactly what it's for.

(Also, it might be worth giving your roommate a quick "hey, sorry I snapped, the nicotine withdrawal is kicking my ass" text, they'll probably get it!) Hang in there. You're doing the hardest part right now.

End of packet. Go to the next tab on your Start here list.